WASHINGTON — Richard

Goodwin, the free-wheeling former White House aide, is undertaking a private mission for the Johnson administration from his new college vantage point.

He is going to give future "direction" and "guidance" to the student revolution now brewing on the college campuses.

According to administration security authorities, Goodwin will seek to unite the left-leaning student movements behind the more revolutionary programs of the Great Society.

He'll help prepare roles that the nation's universities and colleges will play in carrying the Great Society into the community and overseas to the undeveloped nations.

READIES DAMPER

First major objective of Goodwin, now on the staff of the Institute of Advance Studies Wesleyan College, Conn., will be to put a damper on the differences over U. S. Viet Nam policy and channel this student protest effort into support for the administration's social programs.

COPYRGHT

The student groups militant protests this week against U. S. involvement in Viet Nam. administration officials believe Goodwin can accomplish his mission because of the close similarity of their objectives in areas other than Negro and the poor white foreign policy.

They point out that the major group operating behind the scenes of the Viet Nam protests is the Students for a Democratic Society and that members are in general agreement with the more revolutionary educational and anti-poverty projects of the administration.

NEW ALLIANCE

This coming link between the administration and the left-leaning student groups is also hinted at in the latest issue of "Liberation," the radical publication that the SDS and other far-left student groups quote as their bible.

In an article entitled "Another Left," the magazine pinpoints this new combination of forces reporting:

"We must patiently, tolerantly and through the most diversified, experimental forms, begin to bring hundreds of thousands of Americans into a conscious, revolutionary and nonviolent movement for a New Society."

"In the months and years ahead, this general movement will gain strength from three dynamic and foreseeable submovements. Again, these submovements are deeply interconnected, but in all likelihood they will continue to produce different streams of action for a long time to come."

SOCIAL CENTER

"1. The movement to bring together in a genuine alliance the most militant and self-aware individuals among the Negro and the poor white . . .

"2. The movement to revolutionize the public education system of this country, which can result in a thorough reorientation of the very meaning, methodology, and purpose of organized learning. This move-cial-interested and directed communities for both students and teacher-scholars alike. Hopefully, it will be able to provide a new ethical standard for the majority of the American population, who will spend part of their lives in institutions of higher education during the next decade."

"3. The movement to bring into being within the central cities of our largest metropolitan centers, entirely new communities. Such communities would be dedicated to creating fully integrated, mixed income, social units."

MATCHING GOALS

Significantly, all three of these movements were either launched by President Johnson's Great Society or are being supported with massive injections of federal funds under it.

An intensive reading of the legislative history of the President's anti-poverty, higher-educational, and urban redevelopment programs will show that many of the administration's objectives are very similar to those of the radical student groups.

The views of these student groups are also close to the private goals expressed by Health Education and Welfare Secretary John Gardner, one of the key administrators and policy-makers of the Great Society.

Administration officials who have worked with Goodwin, a ghost writer and policymaker for both Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, say that he has the troops" for the administration. Associates of Secretary Gardner stress that the guidelines he is drafting for the multi-billion dollar educational program will encourage rather than check these students' activities.

This Goodwin-Gardner combination could produce some revolutionary changes not only on the campus but in our way of living.

FEDERAL AID SOARS

In the last fiscal year, 1965, the Office of Education appropriation more than doubled—to $5 billion—from $700 million in 1964. In the current fiscal year, 1966, the appropriation again more than doubled—to about $3 billion. This is more than two times the federal budget for education only a decade ago . . . Presidential Assistant Douglass Cater says, "President Johnson believes that education must be the cornerstone of the edifice he calls the Great Society."

Help for parents is analyzed, along with a general review of the problems of higher education, in a new book, "Crisis in College Finance?" by Roger A. Freeman of the Hoover Institution at Stanford University.
